When I reach Wakeling Hall a few minutes later I am shown into a luxurious smoking-drawing room. The room is lit with lamps, the shades being of some semi-transparent texture which gives to every object a subdued appearance. The walls are thickly ornamented with spears and grays and a door of other warlike implements. I have scarcely time to glance about me, and am surprised to find a hunting scene and a jagged wheel a step on the terrace attracts my attention.

"And now," said Sybil. "I will answer your question. My father assured me that he should return in good time this evening. It is past one o'clock; the last train went by an hour ago. If he had come by it, he must have reached here before now. It is scarcely 20 minutes' ride from Wakington station."

"Would he walk?" I could not help this time asking of the lonely road that led by the fields to Wakington Hall. "Did not the carriage go?"
